1.1 Introduction

Change is the movement away from a present state towards a future state (George & Jones, 1996) or generally a response to some significant threat or opportunity arising outside of the organization (Gilgeous, 1997). Changes in technology such as computerization and e-commerce have created a quantum leap in data communication, work processes and the way of doing business. With the impending move towards globalization and liberalization of markets, organizations have to be prepared to cope with the rapid changes in the business dynamics. Every organization must submit to the varying demands and changes in the environment. Changes within an organization took place in response to business and economic events and to processes of managerial perception, choice, and actions where managers saw events taking place that indicate the need for a change (Pettigrew, 1985).

Many organizations found changes to be a real challenge. The change process in each organization was unique in each situation, due to the differences in the nature of the organization, the nature of the business, the work culture and values, management and leadership style, also the behaviour and attitude of the employees. Further, the risk of failure was greater as people are generally resistant to changes. For some, changes might bring satisfaction, joy and advantages, while for others changes might bring pain, stress and disadvantages.
